Admitting Portishead to be the station Mjccus of the It! Aerary, and that it was the general place of Roman embarkation, the auigmable place for landing will appear unquestionably to be at Sadbroolte, in this county, where are still the vestiges of a large Roman encampment. Notwithstanding, however, all my researches, I could not discover any vestiges of a causeway be tween Caldecot-pill and Caerwent, till 1 passed the brook, Ne dera, in the vicinity of Caerwent. Between the brook and the eastern gate I perceived vestiges of an ancient paved causeway, which, within the memory of some of the inhabitants, was more perfect From Caerwent the road is visible beyond the Ne dern, in the direction of Penhow to Caerleon, whence a branch led to Usk. Horsley, who pursued it at the beginning of the In: century, described it as then being prominent and remarkable. The part which he discovered to the east of Caerwent, Mr. Le man very justly...
